

THE UNIVERSITY of EDINBURGH

Edinburgh Research Explorer

The UK's Draft EU Settlement

Citation for published version:

Lavdas, K, The UK's Draft EU Settlement: View from Greece, 2016, Web publication/site, European Futures, Edinburgh. <<http://www.europeanfutures.ed.ac.uk/article-2772>>

Link:

Link to publication record in Edinburgh Research Explorer

Document Version:

Publisher's PDF, also known as Version of record

Publisher Rights Statement:

© 2016 Kostas Lavdas. Published under Creative Commons (CC BY-NC-ND 4.0 International) License

General rights

Copyright for the publications made accessible via the Edinburgh Research Explorer is retained by the author(s) and / or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing these publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

Take down policy

The University of Edinburgh has made every reasonable effort to ensure that Edinburgh Research Explorer content complies with UK legislation. If you believe that the public display of this file breaches copyright please contact openaccess@ed.ac.uk providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.

The UK's Draft EU Settlement: View from Greece

Author(s): Kostas Lavdas

Permalink: <http://www.europeanfutures.ed.ac.uk/article-2772>

Publication: 8 February 2016

Article text:

Following the publication of the UK's draft EU settlement, Kostas Lavdas gives a perspective from Greece on the proposal and the future of the UK-EU relationship.

The EU-UK deal appears to stand a reasonably good chance of doing the job – provided, of course, the UK electorate approves. From the viewpoint of other Member States, the letter drawn up by the President of the European Council, Donald Tusk, has elicited various reactions, only a few of them official to date (e.g. Denmark supports).

To state that Greece is among the most hard-pressed EU members would be to reiterate the obvious. The thing, however, is that Greece is probably the most hard-pressed member of the Eurozone. And the view from the Eurozone is different from that of, say, Poland or Sweden.

There is a broadly shared background assumption in the Greek public that London – being outside the Eurozone and appearing rather detached when it comes to EU affairs anyway – does not matter much. I was talking about the UK referendum to a Greek academic-turned-politician the other day and his reaction was, ‘well, who cares anyway?’

Of course, my jaw dropped. How could this supposedly well-informed person possibly make such a silly remark? I explained the obvious: even bracketing Britain's weight in EU politics, the negotiation itself and its possible direction were a matter of great concern.

In truth, there are groups, institutions and individuals in Greece who take the UK-EU relationship much more seriously. There are three areas of concern. First, particular points of the possible agreement (such as the provision for ‘an alert and safeguard mechanism’ so that if there were excessive strain on the welfare system, in-work benefits could be denied to EU workers for up to four years) may create a precedent and/or open the door to similar or equivalent demands by other states. Second, Britain has always been a great destination for Greeks to study, travel, search for a job or just visit and revisit. A Brexit is approached by many as an unspecified threat to the existence of Europe's western frontier.

Last but crucially, power balances within the EU would be seriously affected and that's one reason why Athens along with every other capital in their right mind wishes to avoid a Brexit. Many people – not just pundits – in Greece take this very seriously. Avoid a Brexit at all costs? Things may change in a month or two, but it's probably correct to report that Greek discussion – preoccupied as it is with a multitude of other urgent issues, such as a struggling economic policy and an equally struggling migration policy – appears to hope that EU-UK relations will not cause yet another European crisis.

In this sense at least, Greeks would wish the UK – our internationalist ‘awkward partner’ – to stay. Who knows? Reaffirming a multiple-speed Europe may prove an interesting idea after all.

Author information:

Kostas Lavdas
Tufts University

Prof Kostas A. Lavdas is Constantine Karamanlis Professor of Hellenic and European Studies at The Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, Tufts University. His research interests include EU external relations, the comparative analysis of government-business relations and republican political theory.

Publication license:

Creative Commons (Attribution-NonCommercial-NoDerivatives 4.0 International)

Additional information:

Please note that this article represents the view of the author(s) alone and not European Futures, the Edinburgh Europa Institute nor the University of Edinburgh.